4 Transnational policy networks and regional public goods in Latin America

Jacint Jordana

Introduction

Regionalism can take different forms. In recent decades, we have witnessed important waves of regionalism amid globalization across the world, but the drivers of these waves have been very different. In Europe, the main driver has been institutionalization and the establishment of formal rules (and often informal ones, too) to arrange the provision of regional public goods (RPGs). In South Asia, regionalism has moved forward thanks to economic integration, often privately driven. In Latin America, however, there has been no clear driver. For decades, the region has been characterized by constant failure in its attempts to advance institutionalization, as well as by weak advances in globalization.

In discussing this challenging situation, this paper will argue that a particular and distinctive driver for regionalism has been emerging in Latin America. The driver that I suggest has been operating strongly in the region is socially shaped and is particularly rooted in the dynamics of myriad nonhierarchical policy networks that operate across countries and sectors throughout the region. As I will explain, this network-based mode of regional integration has been firmly on the rise over the last three decades, and has become capable of providing some level of RPCs, while also contributing to many successful processes of policy diffusion in the region. Unfortunately, these networks do not yet fulfill most of the promises of the “new world order” suggested ten years ago by
